

Amanda 2.0

Before cancer, you're juggling everything—work, social life, money. Now I've almost got this clean slate on how I can start my life again.

July 17, 2018 By Amanda Hayes

I'm finding there's not really a lot to say in regards to life as it is at the minute. However I thought it's about bloody time I updated you, so I decided to do a video this time. That way you can experience the pink hair in all its glory!!

I've found that as I've been experience all that life has to give me, I've been juggling the add ons to it too that I've never had to deal with before, like fatigue and old lady aches. Apparently my new lease of life comes with penalties these days... which I'm not best pleased about!

Along with this, I'm finding that I'm crossing new paths once again of unknown territory! Trying to discover where I fit within society and how I can adapt living with these new restrictions.

Apologies if my last post didn't interest you... I found I was getting a few messages asking for useful info so people could prepare themselves for the troubles that cancer brings. You probably found it completely irrelevant, but hopefully, if in time you have the unfortunate reason to need it, for yourself or someone you know, then at least you know where to go. The cancer life can be so daunting and distressing but hopefully, it'll provide the very smallest of ease, to those who need it.

Please bear with me too... as life is coming out of hibernation I'm in the process of updating a few of my channels. My YouTube channel is looking way too basic for my liking, so once I get my act together I'm hoping to refine this as well as all the other networks that come with it!

Thanks for your patience!

This post originally appeared on Happy Smiling Cancer Girl on July 17, 2018. It is republished with permission.
