

Day 2,703 — PSA Results

April 5, 2018 By Daniel Zeller

The bad news: My PSA continued its upward climb to 0.11 ng/ml. The good news: The rate of increase remained constant (and is still quite slow).

The result is exactly where my spiffy spreadsheet said it would be, so I'm not overly surprised. All that's left to do now is wait for my appointment with the urologist on 19 April. I'll have to do my best to let him speak a little before I assault him with my already prepared list of questions.

This result reinforces my belief that it's time to bring a radiation oncologist into the discussion so I can get his or her perspective on salvage radiation therapy, especially regarding the risks of long-term side effects impacting quality of life and the likelihood of success.

More to come...
