

Month 101 — Homeward Bound

When I went into planning this trip, it was a bucket list trip of sorts. But then my PSA results came back and it became more of a celebration.

April 10, 2019 By Daniel Zeller

This will be a short post, as I'm hammering this out on my tablet somewhere between Zürich, Switzerland and San Diego.

In December, Delta Airlines was having a 24-hour sale on its Delta One service to Europe, and I jumped on the opportunity. I landed a round-trip ticket for 128,000 frequent flyer miles and $93 USD in taxes, fees, and travel insurance. Sweet! The only catch was that I had to travel between February and early May.

When I went into planning this trip, it was a "What if I have to have radiation and this might be the last big trip I can take?" kind of thought running through my head. It was a bucket list trip of sorts. But then my PSA results came back and it became more of a celebratory trip.

I'll work on my detailed post for my travel blog, Travelin' Dan, once I recover from the trip and a 9-hour difference in time, and review a few hundred photos and process only the best. In a nutshell, though, I visited Luzern, Interlaken, Bern, and Fiesch. The photo for this post (above) was taken from the Schilthorn and shows (from left to right) the Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau mountains.

For fun, here's a cell phone photo of the Aletsch Glacier on the south side of the Eiger, Mönch, and Jungfrau, at 23 km / 14 miles, the longest in the Alps. One person told me they had about a meter of fresh snow a week earlier. (It snowed while I was in Luzern.)

The Aletsch Glacier

And a back-to-reality reminder: I talk to the doctor on the 18th about my most recent PSA results.

This post originally appeared on Dan's Journey through Prostate Cancer. It is republished with permission.

© 2026 Smart + Strong All Rights Reserved.

<http://beta.docker.cancerhealth.com/blog/month-101-homeward-bound>